The animated contest in the convention is an assurance of victory for the cause of liberalism in the South. The cohorts of Massey, Groner, and Wise struggled long and valiantly with those of Comeron for the prize of a nomination, which all believed to be the pledge of victory. It was fitting that no "dark horse," no "tired-out candidate," permitted himself to be used to snatch the honor of the race from exhausted chargers, covered with the foam and dust of the struggle.
